When we learn our native language, we first listen, then we speak, then we read, and finally we write. Listening, speaking, reading and writing are the four language skills that we need to develop in order to communicate effectively. Someone "fluent" in a language, we usually mean that they have a high level of all four skills. But as any teacher knows, students often have strengths or weaknesses in certain skills and in some cases can reach high levels, for example, in reading and writing, but cannot speak or listen at a comparable level.

The Common European Competence Framework expands the definition of communicative language skills to five skills and divides spoken language into two skills: oral production and oral interaction. This is based on evidence that the two skills are distinct, as one involves only monologue speech, while the other involves both speaker and listener speaking at the same time. Thus, the test for communicative speech should include both oral production and oral interaction.

A student's development of the four skills may be unbalanced, for example, a student may be strong in reading but weak in listening, writing or speaking. Cambridge English research shows that one of the main reasons ministries and school groups introduce Cambridge English exams is in that they test all four skills and, as a result, pay more attention to speaking and listening. It helps students develop communication skills in English.
